

Involving people with spinal cord injuries in the education of rehabilitation professionals

The Consumer Professional Partnership Programme (CPPP) was developed to increase service user participation of people with spinal cord injury in the education of rehabilitation professionals. The programme seeks to inform physiotherapists and other rehabilitation professionals about disability and health issues from the perspective of individuals with spinal cord injury. This article discusses its development, describes the details and rationale behind the programme and reports on first experiences of rehabilitation professionals using the programme.
